A pitched battle took place between the revolters and the inspector's posse, which lasted for about an hour, the assailants having set fire to the neighboring buildings, eight in number, and the upholders of the law were compelled to capitulate.

The insurgents, after this first success, planned greater things, and got together all the discontents of the neighborhood, who pledged themselves to follow wherever David Bradford, the leader, would designate.

The Falmouth record, which happened at Pendennis Point, was for a brief gust, which is caused by mechanical interference with the steady movement of an air current. The konour of recording the highest actual hourly velocity of wind anywhere in England belongs to Fisetwood, where in 1894 a steady speed of 78 miles per hour was registered on the anemometer. So far as accurate, records are available, no English wind has ever beat that hustle.
